TEXT

Since democracy is a government by the majority, most people have chance of contributing to discussions and taking part in decision making. The periodic election of the members of these bodies reduces friction and makes people accept laws by government. Democracy also promotes orderly transfer of power. This ensures political stability as dissent and military groups are minimized. Again, democracy is a safeguard against concentration of power. There is separation of powers whereby different people are entrusted with power in the major arms of government, namely: Legislature; Executive and Judiciary. In a democratic system, the rule of law works. Despite differences in people in terms of wealth, occupation, education and health, all citizens enjoy equal political rights. Democracy is essential in society in order to permit free expressions of opinions and constructive criticisms.

In spite of these benefits, democracy has some weaknesses. Some of these include the following: it is difficult to practice democracy because it is expensive to win where the economy is weak, like that of Ghana. It is difficult financially to put institution in place Democracy is meaningless where there is widespread poverty. For democracy to work, people must see economic prosperity and a significant degree of economic equality.
